September 1949

Hal had several very good jobs offered to him this summer, and it was a problem to decide which was the best one. He wanted a job that would be a real challenge, and one in which there would be much opportunity for growth.

Although three other positions (all were positions as chairman of Music Education) would have paid from five to eight hundred dollars more, he decided the offer as head of a new department of music in the Joliet Junior College was the best for him. The organizing of a brand new music curriculum appealed to him.

This fall Hal is installing a program which will enable any graduate to enter any university in the country without losing credit.